RICHIE RICH in COUSIN NUTLEY

"Nutley," Mr. Rich spoke patiently, though he studied the half-dozen trumpets with some dismay, "I didn't ask you to get six trumpets. I said six crumpets!"

Young Nutley Rich shrugged. "Trumpets, crumpets—what's the difference, as long as you can blow them?"

Richie was unable to conceal his exasperation. "Well, you're half-right," he said to his cousin. You do blow a trumpet—but a crumpet is a sort of biscuit, to be eaten!"

Nutley wasn't even listening; there was already something else on his mind as he left Dad Rich's study. Richie shook his head; Dad only smiled.

"He's not like other Riches, Dad. They're all brilliant businessmen. But Nutley never seems to do anything right!"

Rich, Sr., said quietly, "We Riches always help each other. It's up to you to teach Nutley to do things right. Let him learn from his mistakes!"

Richie was doubtful about the whole thing, but he'd try to teach Nutley. Dad gave Richie $500 to further Nutley's education. The boys went out together.

Richie told his cousin about the $500 and that Nutley was to invest it any way he wished. The first thing he did when they reached town was to enter an antiques store to see what he might buy.

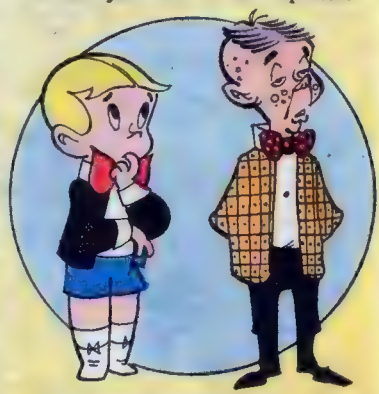
Richie was tempted to advise against investing any capital in antiques because his Dad knew antiques, and if there were any antiques in that store worth having, it would be in the Rich collection. But Richie held his tongue.

"I'll buy this!" Nutley exclaimed, digging out a dusty old painting in a worn gold frame. The dealer looked bored.

"The frame is worth $10," he said. "The picture you can have for free!"

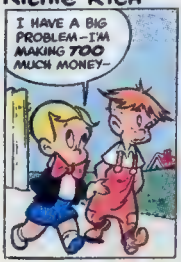
"That frame isn't worth more than $2!" Richie told Nutley. His cousin ignored the advice, as usual.

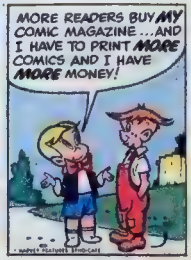
Nutley dusted off the painting and read the painter's name. "Van Wendt," he remarked indifferently. But a man who had just entered was impressed.



"Let's see that painting, son!" the fellow cried, trembling with excitement. Nutley held up the framed canvas. The man looked at the name on it and shouted, "That's right—a Van Wendt!

Richie RICH





I'll pay you $200 for it!"

"Sorry," Nutley told him with finality, "I can't let that painting go for a cent more than $2!"

Richie kept quiet though he was angry and puzzled, for his cousin asked for a $10 bill. Nevertheless, Richie handed it to him, and he handed it to the man.

"Just give me my $8 change!" Nutley demanded. And the bewildered man gave the boy what he asked for and left with the painting!

As they continued along the way Richie pointed out that not only did Nutley pay the man $2 to take the picture, but it was probably worth thousands of dollars.

Richie's criticism fell on unlistening ears. Cousin Nutley was staring at a silver dollar the man had given him in change.

"This is an odd-looking coin!" he remarked.

"That's another thing," warned Richie. "Watch out for the kind of money you take in change!"

Nutley Rich tossed the coin away. If it wasn't any good, why be burdened with it? A very dignified-looking man picked the coin up and studied it with interest. He ran after the boy, caught up with him and panted eagerly, "This coin you dropped — it's very rare. Will you take $2,000 for it?"

"Okay." Nutley spoke briefly. "Cash!" The man drew a thick bankroll from his pocket and peeled off twenty $100 bills. Richie gaped with astonishment as his companion carelessly stuffed the money into his pants pocket.

While Richie was trying to think of something instructive to say, Nutley suddenly looked around, cried excitedly and pointed to a man running down the street away from them.

"That man has my money! I have a hole in my pocket, Richie!"

Richie immediately whipped a police whistle from his pocket and blew it. This brought a policeman tearing around the corner — smack into the man who had picked up Nutley's wad of money, and down went the thief!

Well, why drag out the tale when you have probably guessed what happened. Not only did Cousin Nutley get his money back, but $5,000 in addition — a reward for the capture of Slippery Slim Sloane, long wanted for burglary, fraud and many traffic violations.

As Richie later put it to his Dad, "We Riches have more than brains and business ability. We have an awful lot of LUCK!" Dad grinned his agreement.
